

Generation Y, 'The Millennials':

1980s-2000s

#4

Ignore the media stereotyping, this is the cautious ‘Generation Rent’ who are taking hands-on investment decisions as they strive for financial freedom.

1980s-2000s

Misunderstood by older generations and vilified by the media, Millennials are now entering the investment scene in earnest. Just like previous generations, their attitude to money and wealth management has been shaped by the experience of the economic downturn – and their reaction could not be more different to their parents or grandparents.

The term 'Millennials' generally applies to individuals who were born after 1980 and reached adulthood at the turn into the 21st century. Millennials were raised during the boom times and relative peace of the 1990s, only to see their sunny world dashed by the September 11 attacks in New York and the global economic downturn. Even though they emerged from the recession unscathed – indeed many of them were still at school at the time – the impact on their attitude towards money and saving has been profound, experts suggest. Theirs is a story of innocence lost.

Now many are earning a good living but the impact of the crisis and the volatility of the financial markets is evident in how they spend, save and manage their money. In particular, there's evidence that playing it safe, and being risk averse and self-reliant is very much a reaction to seeing their parents and grandparents lose a great deal of net worth during that time.

That cautiousness is partly responsible for delaying property purchases, resulting in the moniker 'generation rent' but also leading them to put off having children. Nonetheless the definition of success among this cohort of successful individuals is the ability to provide for family.

The selfie generation – shaped by technology and supposedly obsessed with social media – has an altogether different attitude to saving; typically, Millennials are far less likely to worry about future financial needs and putting something to one side for the future. Instead, it's much more about living for the day and meeting current expenses. According to recent research by Britain Thinks, a UK-based research and strategy group, Millennials know how important it is to manage money, but think it's boring and would much rather be socialising, thank you very much.

Underlying mistrust in financial institutions as a result of the GFC – or great financial crisis, an acronym most likely to appeal to younger media consumers – and subsequent recession, together with their passion for technology, means many are considering taking investment decisions into their own hands using online investment platforms to play the markets. While returns are the name of the game for this cohort, many refuse to compromise family or personal values when it comes to investment decisions.

The premise of retirement, meanwhile, seems to have shifted from the idea of working for a set amount of time to a far broader concept of financial freedom, whether that be in their 50s, 60s or beyond. Although the introduction of pension auto enrolment has been a massive political success story in terms of getting more people to save for retirement – the latest statistics show that 80% of this age group now regularly pay into some form of pension pot – a certain complacency reigns.

However, the reality is that 70% of them are still not investing nearly enough to provide for a comfortable retirement and far fewer Millennials have their pension pots reviewed, compared with those closer to retirement age. Many simply don't appreciate the scale of the job in hand and that relying on basic auto-enrolment alone just isn't sufficient to fund retirement.

At the same time, many among this generation are unsure as to the best way to save for retirement. In particular, there is widespread confusion over how the benefits of the Lifetime ISA compare to a pension – underlined by the fact that very few providers actually offer one. This is the savings account which must be opened before the age of 40, known as the "LISA", which was launched in April 2017. It offers an attractive 25% bonus from the UK Government, worth up to £1,000 per year which can be used to save for a first home or for retirement.

The precarious nature of the emerging and often criticised gig economy, where freelance and uncontracted work is the norm, goes some way to explaining why their attitude to debt is radically different to their forebears. More risk averse than previous generations, Millennials are far less likely to invest in stocks and shares, instead preferring physical assets and cash.

Despite their live and let live attitude, Millennials do have financial concerns and worries about supporting ageing parents and in-laws. They are the generation most concerned with what they will face should they run out of money in their later years, and yet few have actually done anything about it in terms of saving enough for retirement.

Case Study:

Sarah

Having graduated from university in 2012, Sarah now works in the software industry. She still has the remnants of a student loan to pay off and has amassed credit card debts of around £2,000 but other than that she has managed to avoid taking out any other loans. Should paying off her student loan be a priority, she asks?

Since auto-enrolment was introduced, Sarah has been paying into a pension set up by her employer but she accepts that current contribution levels are nowhere near enough to provide her with a comfortable retirement. What should her

Should paying off her student loan be a priority?

Since auto-enrolment was introduced, Sarah has been paying into a pension set up by her employer but she accepts that current contribution levels are nowhere near enough to provide her with a comfortable retirement. What should her strategy for her pension be, particularly given that she has more pressing financial priorities, in particular property investment?

Sarah is still renting but she is keen to get a foot on the property ladder and her parents have kindly offered to stump up the deposit. She is keen to explore any tax-efficient ways to save for her first home but admits also that enjoying a relatively carefree and single existence is more of a priority at the moment.

She has no other investments and admits to being financially naïve when it comes to the options available to her. She isn't ruling out investing in shares although says ethical and sustainable investments would be a priority. ■

Top Tips — Generation Y, 'The Millennials': 1980s-2000s

Anna Murdock
Head of Wealth Planning

- 1. First and foremost, Sarah should review her debt; it's probably more sensible to tackle the credit card payments before the student debt as its likely she's paying more interest on these
- 2. If she's nervous about committing any more to her pension, she should consider investing in an ISA which is more flexible in terms of accessing the funds, should she need to
- 3. Ensuring she discusses her plans about buying a property with her parents should be a priority and exploring the most tax-efficient way in which they can gift or loan her the money for the deposit
- 4. Although she may not yet be in a position to invest, to help her understand the markets and options open to her it's well worth reading up on how to invest and getting the basics under her belt. This will help her feel more in control when the time comes Investment involves risk. The value of investments and the income from them can go down as well as up and investors may not get back the amount originally invested.
